Vogue's Five Jewellery 'Trends' of 2026 – Worth the Investment or a Passing Phase?

British Vogue has spoken, late last year an article was published outlining the five 'major' jewellery trends that Vogue is predicting for 2026. We have cast our eye over these fashionable trends straight from the runway, and provided suggestions of pieces that may already be in your collection, or prudent purchases that will continue to hold value in the coming years, and of course – we couldn't resist adding our own forecasted trends for the year ahead.

Bold Jewellery Over Stacking

Vogue's Choice – Dries Van Noten Embellished Pendant Necklace. £595 MyTheresa.

Our Choice – Coral jade and diamond bird earrings, Hannams Auctioneers, estimated at £300-500 (6th-9th January)

According to the Vogue article, bold and sculptural pieces worn singularly are set to overtake the previous trends of layering necklaces and stacking rings. 'Atmospheric' pieces, bold in proportion, design and colour are the key for adding life to minimalist styled clothing. In the search for bold, statement jewellery at a reasonable price, I would always recommend turning to the auction catalogues. On the hunt for a 'coral' comparable I found these charming bird earrings – certainly a statement, estimated at only £300-500.

Torques, Collars and Cuffs

Celebrating the versatility of the collar and cuff, Vogue asserts that these pieces can be worn over a fine knit or combined with a simple t-shirt. The perfect way to add some style substance to nearly any outfit, Vogue selects a Gucci costume jewellery collar necklace retailing for £810, we would recommend a perennial classic, the Elsa Peretti Bone Cuff, or any gold cuffs, flat snake chains or torque bangles that you may already have in your collection.

Silver Jewellery

Vogue quite rightly references the extreme rise in gold prices in its predictions for the year ahead. Silver jewellery has been spotted on several catwalks and presents a cost-effective alternative to white gold both at the jewellers' bench and to the end consumer. As such, mixing metals and two-toned designs are predicted to be amongst the more prevalent trends for the coming year. We would recommend selecting signed silver pieces, particularly from Scandinavian makers such as Georg Jensen, Lapponia, Anton Michelsen or contemporaries as these pieces retain a timeless style and a fairly consistent premium on the open market.

Vogue's Choice – Juju Vera, Petra Silver Necklace. £530, Net-A-Porter.

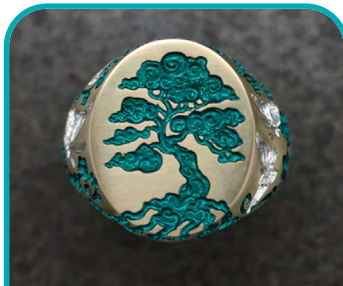

Our Choice – Björn Weckström for Lapponia Vintage Modernist Sterling Silver Necklace. £455.10, 1st Dibs.

Pinky Rings

Vogue's Choice – Jillian Maddin, One-of-a-kind Odette Swan Portrait Ring. £5,595, Tomfoolery London.

Our Choice – Castro Smith, Tree of Life Signet Ring. £7,440

Vogue certainly touts 2026 as “the year of the pinky ring,” a fairly timeless staple in many jewellery collections. The pinky rings this year however veer further from the classic signet rings, eschewing these for more intricate gem-set and intricately engraved designs. Vogue's correspondent references a portrait cut synthetic sapphire ring from Jillian Maddin, retailing for £5,595. Other contemporary jewellers that add a creative flair to this trend are Castro Smith and Cece Jewellery.

'Pieces with Permanence' - Fine Over Demi-Fine Jewellery

An ongoing style resolution that we can all vouch for! Opting for precious gemstones, and pieces with material permanence is always in vogue!

Our Suggested Fine Jewellery Trends for 2026 and Beyond!

Coloured Gemstones and Diamonds

Masterpiece Pink Diamond and Diamond earrings. Pragnell, £140,000.

In a sea of fashionably neutral and earth-toned outfits, jewellery is a wonderful way to add some flair. The continuing demand for natural, high quality coloured gemstones and fancy coloured diamonds, in opposition to colourless D-F grade lab grown diamonds will see no letting up. Big investments from retailers and manufacturers into promoting tinted and brown diamonds at retail level – see De Beers. Desert Diamonds have indicated this sartorial push. Of course, breathtaking canary yellow, vibrant pink, orange, blue and green diamonds will continue their reign at the very top end of the market. Coloured gemstones of natural origin such as sapphires, rubies, spinel, emerald and opal will continue to add vibrancy to the most discerning of collections.

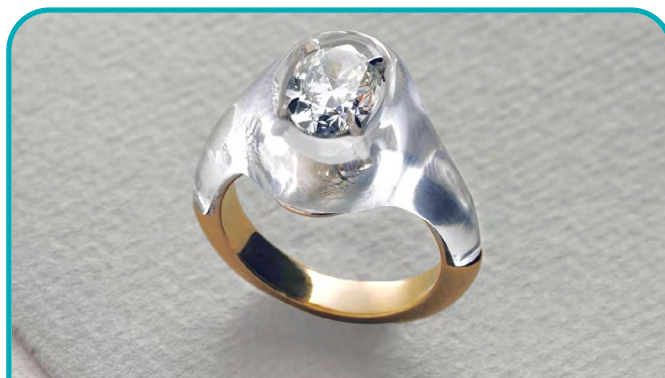

Unique Cuts

The high-profile engagement rings of 2025, coupled with the overarching desire for the rare, unique and coveted has shone a spotlight on lapidary, carving and manufacturing. I would expect this demand for pieces delivering 'out of the ordinary' stone shapes to only continue into 2026 and thereafter. Whether it be the unique and charming qualities of old cut diamonds, fascinating historical intaglios first runway show for Dior last year, stacking agate and turquoise bangles each set with diamond and quartz. Breathtaking and 'cutting-edge' releases from the likes of Seaman Schepps and Ana Khouri seem to indicate a propulsion of the trend and a modern take on Suzanne Belperron's distinctive Mid-Century style.

that tell ancient tales, brand-new innovative diamond cuts or hyper-realistic hardstone carvings, jewels showcasing these exquisitely finished stones will deservedly find an increased popularity that will outlast many seasons to come.

Setting Stones

Combining each of the predictions above, a big trend that can be expected into the coming years is the use of semi-precious stones for setting their precious counterparts in contemporary jewellery. Jonathan Anderson teased this trend in his

Suzanne Belperron. Star Sapphire, Chalcedony and Diamond ring, circa 1961. POA from Pat Saling.
